A stack of Amazon packages overlaid with a clock and a map of San Francisco Aygun Aliyeva / Shutterstock / Arsh Raziuddin / The Atlantic / Google Maps I'm sure I looked comical as I staggered down a downtown San Francisco stree t on a recent weekday, arms full of packages-as I dropped one and bent down to p ick it up, another fell, and as I tried to rein that one in, another toppled. Yet it wasn't funny, not really. There I was, wearing a bright-yellow safety vest and working for Amazon Flex, a program in which the e-commerce giant pays regular people to deliver packages from their own vehicles for $18 to $25 an hou r, before expenses. I was racing to make the deliveries before I got a ticket-th ere are few places for drivers without commercial vehicles to park in downtown S an Francisco during the day-and also battling a growing rage as I lugged parcels to offices of tech companies that offered free food and impressive salaries to their employees, who seemed to spend their days ordering stuff online. Technolog y was allowing these people a good life, but it was just making me stressed and cranky. &quot:NOT. A. GOOD. DEAL &quot: I scrawled in my notebook, after having walked d

" NOT. A. GOOD. DEAL, " I scrawled in my notebook, after having walked down nine flights of stairs, sick of waiting for a freight elevator that may or may not have been broken, and returned to my car for another armful of packages. Uncompromising quality. Enduring impact.
