5 Facts About the State of the Gender Pay Gap

March 24 is Equal Pay Day, a symbolic day that represents the number of extra days women, on average, must work to earn what men, on average, earned the year before. And for mothers and many women of color, this date falls much later in the year.

According to Bureau of Labor Statistics data, in 2020, women's annual earnings were 82.3% of men's, and the gap is even wider for many women of color. Though women only made 57 cents per dollar earned by men in 1973 when this Department of Labor PSA was made, progress has stalled and we're still far from closing the pay gap.

2. There is more than one Equal Pay Day

3. Women earn less than men in nearly all occupations

4. Women earn less than their same race and ethnicity counterpart at every level of educational attainment

5. The pandemic has set women's labor force participation back more than 30 years

So what can we do to achieve pay equity? There's clearly a lot of work to be done, but it is possible to level the playing field for working women by increasing transparency around wages across the board, disrupting occupational segregation, expanding access to paid leave and child and elder care, and creating more good union jobs.
